SYNOPSIS

Living only long enough to feel the touch of her little one's fingers, his mother dies and Oliver, the baby, is left in the notorious workhouse of Dunderidge, near London. He isn't very many years older when the unkindly officials give him to Sowerberry as an undertaker's apprentice, following the famous and outrageous request "for more." Oliver escapes from Sowerberry and on the road to London meets The Artful Dodger, who promises that his friend Fagin will give the boy food and lodging. Fagin makes a pupil of Oliver in the gentle art of picking pockets. It is while watching The Artful Dodger at work that Oliver is arrested as a thief. Freed, he is befriended by a wealthy Mr. Brownlow, who takes him to his home and provides him with the first comfort he has ever known. Meanwhile the mysterious Monks, actually Oliver's half brother, seeks Fagin's aid in driving the boy into some crime, it having developed that Oliver is the heir to a large fortune, the one condition of which is that he shall reach the age of twenty-one without having committed an act which will bring him into public disgrace. Otherwise, the fortune goes to Monks. Nancy Sikes, wife of Bill Sikes, the burglar, discovers Oliver on an errand for Brownlow and, kidnapping him, returns to Fagin's attic. Sikes is then brought into the scheme to make the boy a criminal. He takes Oliver in a burglary expedition, but the boy is able to warn the inmates of the house, although in doing so he is shot by Sikes. The people take Oliver in and care for him. On hearing his story they convey him to Brownlow, who brings the attention of the police to Fagin and Sikes. Brownlow, while knowing all about the boy's fortune does not know Monks is behind the plot. When the raid is made Oliver points out the mysterious Monks - a title adopted for the underworld - and the man is forced to confess. Sikes in an attempt to escape from the rooftop is hung, while Fagin meets the same end administered by law. Oliver remains with Brownlow, who now acts as his guardian until such time as he inherits the fortune.
